THE EDITOR SPEAKS

YES or NO

The art of saying no is often perceived as a greater challenge than saying yes, and thus this notion has gained a lot of currency over the last few years. Due to this stupefying leap in the faith of saying no, we find abundance of debates and discussions that hover around exploring the best way to accomplish this task. Ironically, the time that was spent on glorifying the impact of saying 'yes' is now devoted to mastering the art of saying no. Of course, it is completely fine to say 'no' when it is appropriate as there are situations that quintessentially require a blunt or firm 'no'. However, using this tool as an expression of showing power or reluctance to grow can be devastating. It may create a block to positivity, self-exploration, creativity and awareness.

On the other hand, saying yes, in the most challenging situations, is an acknowledgment of one's consciousness about their inner strength. It is a practice that helps us push our boundaries to distant horizons. I remember the lines written in the book The Year of Yes that describe 'yes' as a mantra that needs to be chanted daily. It should be, as I quote: 'yes to doing, yes to play, yes to a cause, yes to people, yes to help, yes to accomplishment, yes to compliments, yes to difficulties, yes to conversations, yes to who I am, yes to be beautiful in my own ways...' Our history bears testimony to the fact that all great souls that are remembered for their noble deeds must have said yes to themselves a hundred times.

So, what is your pick: 'yes' or 'no'?
